Increase your.The long-term objective of this proposal is to understand the sensory-motor processing pathways involved in the control of limb movements. The research plan addresses four specific questions: 1) What are the neural mechanisms involved in the control of limb movements? 2) How do these mechanisms differ among the three types of limb movements that occur during normal locomotion? 3) How does the intact nervous system compensate for the loss of descending control which occurs following spinal transection of the decerebrate cat? 4) What is the organization of the neural circuitry responsible for the ascending reticulospinal pathway? The experiments described in this application would be the first step in a long-term effort to understand the basic principles that govern the control of limb movements. The data obtained from the proposed experiments should provide information about the type of information used in the control of locomotion as well as the neural pathways involved in the control of limb movements.Many modern radio frequency (RF) applications require generation of high quality and precisely regulated RF signals. For example, many applications utilize circuits that operate in the microwave and millimeter wave frequency ranges. In particular, microwave and millimeter wave applications generally require the generation of high quality and precisely regulated RF signals. One conventional method for generating high quality and precisely regulated RF signals is to generate a crystal oscillator having a specific frequency using conventional crystal oscillator technology. Since conventional crystal oscillators are limited in frequency range and precision, current designs generally utilize a combination of several crystal oscillators to generate a desired frequency. As an example of such a conventional RF signal generation system, FIG. 1 illustrates a RF signal generation system including a frequency division multiplexer (FDM) 105, a first crystal oscillator 110 and a second crystal oscillator 115. The FDM 105 includes a programmable frequency divider that receives a frequency input from an external frequency source (e.g., a crystal oscillator) and generates a multiplexed output signal (f1, f2,... fn) comprised of a predetermined number of outputs (e.g., two). The outputs of the FDM 105 are coupled to a crystal oscillator 110 and 115, where the frequency of one of the outputs is divided by the crystal oscillator 110 and 115 to provide an output signal (f1/f2, f3/f4,... fn/f1, f2/f3,
