How successfully we are able to maintain or shift our attention is critical to our daily-life performance. Because visual attention is especially important in the context of text reading, this electrophysiological study examined the response to words bearing attentional cues in a visual evoked potential (VEP) study. Moreover, an EEG study examined the efficiency of selective attention by eliciting task-specific modulation patterns of the N170, an index of face processing. VEP results revealed that pro-attend to the words bearing cues there were longer P100N1 peak latencies, the N1 amplitude (P1, N1) decreased, and the N170 amplitude increased. EEG results revealed that task-specific modulations of the N170 could be elicited by providing spatial attention, as well as by categorization of text. Observed topographic modulations suggest that onset contralateral to the target word is early and occipital, shifting later to the bottom right in the second half of the trial to be related to only letter categorization. In addition, as a control, a word that did not appear on every single page was tested and no modulations were found for it at any stage of the trial. Moreover, a negative N1 modulation was found, but none of the other functional modulations for it was found. These results show the utility of VEP and EEG methods in examining the modulatory effects of attention, as well as show
