Adobe says it's long sought to streamline the experience of sharing Photoshop files with clients in an easy-to-use and effective way. To do that, Share for Review offers a number of features—from the Dropbox we all know and love to more sophisticated services like Clip Studio . The Adobe SDK is now available in open, developed form—giving developers the ability to improve the experience of the Pencil and other features by extending the Pencil. Rating the Pencil's pressure sensitivity and using it as a drawing instrument has proven to be one of the most popular features of the Pencil. With the introduction of Lightroom 8, the software that professionals use to create and manage Lightroom Presets now includes a palette of professional content-specific presets. These presets are all designed to enhance your photos to their most professional and creative strengths. Processing Levels in Lightroom are now configurable in Open Select—so if you're processing a large number of photos or RAW files at once, you can quickly and efficiently expose and correct the light source in one go. The existing exposure controls in Lightroom now have a new function, Auto bracketing. This uses the camera to find the best exposures automatically, for example if you're shooting underwater. Auto-bracketing is designed to avoid clipping highlights and shadows, which is one of the ways in which professional photographers can balance lighting, character and look for their images.

The Adobe Institute team has spent hundreds of hours investing in GPU APIs (graphics process units) that are now the foundation of the new pipeline. These GPUs mitigate Cold Fusion (CF) and the runtime to provide a stable and predictable environment for applications. This also relieves the CPU of the costly business logic in the ColdFusion runtime engine to eliminate the CPU-to-GPU Access time, i.e. the time to talk to the GPU from the CPU. The new Adobe Graphics Accelerator (AGA) takes on this new task of going from Houdini GPU to Cold Fusion in GPU as well, so we can benefit from its capabilities without providing any proprietary features in Houdini.

Photoshop Elements has always included a Wacom tablet capability for professional digital artists, but the app has never been designed specifically as a digital art collaborative tool -- it has always been more of a device to edit digital photographs. Thanks to its new Share for Review feature, however, Photoshop Elements can join the growing number of apps that make a seamless transition between input and output. Share for Review is a brand new desktop app built on Adobe Sensei AI that enables artists to invite participants into a collaborative review of their image. Artists can invite up to three remote participants to view the images on their own desktops, and use a mouse to draw or annotate illustrations directly on the images as well as view the others' creations and edit the images from the same desktop. Artists then send the image with all the annotations to the Design Review app to review by other participants. In some cases, users will also have the option to embed the annotations into the image using Contexts, which opens the images in a browser.
