Coronary disease is a major cause of death in the developed world, and many cases are now believed to be caused by rupture of an atherosclerotic plaque. Plaque rupture is believed to be triggered by local inflammation within the plaque. The molecular mechanisms of this local inflammation, which can lead to the rupture of the plaque, are unknown. The first step in inflammation is the uptake of lipid-filled macrophages, which are called foam cells, into the walls of the artery. Foam cells have been observed in the atherosclerotic plaques of human coronary arteries and are a known source of inflammatory mediators. Recently, several lines of evidence have suggested that cholesterol efflux from macrophages, via the ATP-binding cassette transporter A1 (ABCA1) in the plasma membrane of the cell, plays a key role in reverse cholesterol transport and could therefore have a protective effect against atherosclerosis. ABCA1 transports cellular cholesterol and phospholipids, as well as non-lipoprotein sterols, from the cell. The role of ABCA1 in atherogenesis has been demonstrated in both mice and humans. For example, overexpression of ABCA1 in mice was found to protect against atherosclerosis, whereas knock out of ABCA1 in mice leads to increased atherosclerosis. Thus, upregulation of ABCA1 is thought to be a desirable therapeutic approach to the treatment of atherosclerosis and other diseases. U.S. Pat. No. 6,124,308 describes pharmaceutical formulations of ABCA1 suitable for the delivery of pharmaceuticals to an atherosclerotic plaque in an animal. The formulations described in the '308 patent are designed to delay the release of pharmaceuticals and to target the formulations to the site of the disease. However, in this case, the formulations are designed to be released at a site distant from the site of the disease. U.
